UNLV TV
Spring 2012

UNLV TV is a self-supporting, professionally staffed television production unit housed within the Hank Greenspun School of Journalism and Media Studies. Founded in 1990, the unit produces original educational programming for and about the university, provides production services for Southern Nevada non-profit agencies and for UNLV administration, departments and schools. UNLV TV employs approximately 20 student workers who assist in the production of projects requested by campus organizations, departments, colleges or schools. Students work under the supervision of professional staff members. These members are: a general manager, a senior producer, a broadcast engineer and a media (IT) engineer.

The School of Journalism and Media Studies offers a class in television news, Journalism 424. Students in the class produce a daily newscast, streamed live via the UNLV TV website. These students are considered members of the media and cover events on campus as members of the media. If press passes are required, our students secure the necessary credentials before covering the event. The class is taught by assistant professor Gary Larson and he is responsible for the content of the newscast.

Images recorded by UNLV TV or by members of the news class are never used for commercial purposes.
